In the Soviet Union, we are faced with an antagonist who has raised the art of espionage to an unprecedented height, while developing the collateral techniques of subversion and deception into a formidable ^{powerful} instrument of attack. No other country has ever before assembled these on such a scale. These operations in support of the USSR's general policies go on in times of so-called truce and under the guise of co-existence with the same vigor as in times of actual crises. Our intelligence has a major share of the task of neutralizing such hostile activities which present a common danger to us and our
